Never Run From a Human in an Urban Enviroment.

OC OC

Thiago watched as the blue alien woman lost her purse. The police failed horribly to keep up with the thief as he bolted with his ill-gotten riches. He knew they wouldn't catch him as he bolted through the neon lit night time of the city of grime and color. Thiago looked around and noticed a small ledge just within jumping height. He quickly scaled the wall and grabbed the ledge, then used it to scale the building. He ran to the opposite edge of the building and looked quickly until he clocked the thief not far from him.

He made his way towards the still fleeing thief, jumping between buildings and street lights to catch the much faster alien. The Ithakian stopped to catch his breath when he was sure he was safe. Thiago perched just above him and shouted down.

"Excuse me but I don't think that belongs to you, leave it on the ground and walk away."

The thief looked up in bewilderment, staring straight at the strange primate that was on a *roof* above him. He knew the human could not outpace him and so he bolted again. Thiago rolled his eyes as the alien took off, and continued to freerun after him, for blocks upon dirty blocks until settling into an alley highlighted in pink. The thief once again halted when he felt he was safe, and once again Thiago sat on the ledge two stories above him and shouted back down.

"Sir, once again I must inform you that that purse does not belong to you."

Once again the thief looked up in confusion.

"How are you here again? How are you following me?"

"Well sir by using the ancient art of Parkour! You cannot outrun me, and I suggest you turn over the purse. Next time you'll have to turn yourself in to the authorities."

"I'm too fast for you silly primate! You'll have to catch me again!" The thief said in a winded tone, clearly he was getting tired, but alas, once again he ran, and once again Thiago gave pursuit. For even more streets and blocks and alleys, the thief ran. Yet this round of pursuit was slower than the last two. So when the thief landed in a blue lit alleyway and collapsed onto his knees as he sat to rest. And once again Thiago perched above him.

"Good sir," Thiago began, causing the thief to preform a half hearted jump, "this is your last chance to return the purse to me. I must urge you to surrender yourself or the stolen goods. Or I must report you to the police!" The thief stared at Thiago in disbelief as Thiago hung above him by holding onto a pole, before tossing the purse onto the ground and tiredly walking away. Thiago worked his way down the building and picked the purse up, before scaling back up the building and making his way back to the victim, and handing the purse back to her.
